The Impact of the Gold Rush on Native Americans of California

A Source Investigation

Sally Bell, survivor of the Needle Rock Massacre

Nisenan survivor

Jerry James, survivor of the Indian Island Massacre

Lucy Young, survivor of an attack at Fort Seward

Experience NK360°'s newest online lesson with Taylor Pennewell (Berry Creek Rancheria of Tyme Maidu Indians), executive director of the Native advocacy nonprofit Redbud Resource Group and a former teacher. The Impact of the Gold Rush on Native Americans of California asks students to analyze primary sources, maps, images, and history to answer the question: Do American actions against the Native peoples of California during the gold rush meet the United Nations definition of genocide? The session will walk teachers through the lesson and share recommended extension options for educators with additional time in their curricula. This lesson is designed for grades 8–12 but is open to teachers of grades 4–12.

The course begins at 10 am on July 24.

Kintsukuroi is the Japanese art of repairing pottery using urushi lacquer and gold. Yet, it is also something more. It shows us that something shattered can be restored and made stronger and more beautiful.

The term is an apt metaphor for the Japanese American community during WWII. Homes and farms lost, businesses destroyed, lives broken. More than 120,000 people were unjustly imprisoned. Our film follows the Ito family from its pre-war life in San Francisco to the concentration camps of the American West to the battlefields of Europe as it suffers through the most shameful periods of this country's history.

The film, Kintsukuroi will be screening at 1pm July 27 and July 28 at the Lighthouse Cinema in Pacific Grove. This is a fundraiser for the Asian Community of Marina, ACOM. ACOM is in the process of creating an Asian-designed garden within Locke-Paddon Park in Marina.
